The BBC news is reporting [2] that "people are becoming so dependent on their mobile phones that one in three are concerned that losing their phone would mean they lose their friends."

"We're a nation of lazy so-and-sos," David Noone from Intervoice said."

vnunet is running [3] a similar story stating "over half of mobile users do not have a separate address book, and one in five use their mobile as their only record of phone numbers."
