Phosh is an open source user, mobile-friendly user interface originally created by Purism for the Librem 5 smartphone. It's designed from the ground up to work with small, touchscreen devices. It's now available for a wide range of mobile Linux distributions.

But some features that have been available for other mobile operating systems for years are still making their way to Phosh. For example, version v0.13.1, which was released today, is the first that has a "clear all" button that lets you dismiss multiple notifications at once.
