If you're not aware of a systemd, let me explain this a little. The systemd or the system daemon is a sort tool or application that runs automatically in the system's background on many Linux distributions to improve the performance. There are many applications that require a daemon to maintain all the functions active. But, there has been a demand for the systemd-free Linux distributions for a long while. Many experts and users say that having a system daemon might slow down your system a little, or it could divert us from the original purpose of using Linux, which is making things simple and making the entire system efficient.
