We're still waiting for Ubuntu Mobile, Canonical's mobile operating system, to finally make its official debut on a smartphone. To whet our appetite, smartphone manufacturer Meizu has published a short demonstration video showing the OS in action on one of its phones. In it, we get a closer look at how the software will perform when used for everyday tasks, such as typing on the keyboard, switching apps, and navigating through the home screens. Consider our appetite whetted Canonical, just get on with releasing a phone we can go out and buy.
