I'm very glad that the author admits to being a 'Windows guy' at the beginning of the article. At least he's being up front about it, and that's rather refreshing. That said, I disagree with most of his conclusions. He's clearly stuck in the mid 1990s or so in his mindset while the rest of the world has moved on from those days of complete Microsoft domination of the computing world. I give him props for noting that he has tried other operating systems and platforms, but he doesn't seem to have gotten much out of them as the Windows-centric mindset still seems to dominate his thinking.
