Over the past few weeks, enterprise tech giant Red Hat has made announcements which makes clear the path in which the firm is travelling. The company recently acquired IT automation provider Ansible, as well as announcing membership of the Node.js Foundation as a platinum member, alongside companies such as IBM, Intel, and Microsoft among others.

The former represents a continued move towards providing DevOps capabilities for its customers, accelerating application development and smoothing out problems for the line of business. The latter is attacking a similar goal through a different method, optimising application throughput for the real-time web.
